America Looks to Alaska For Its Supply of Tin

The European war disclosed, among many other things, that the United States is commercially independent of the rest of the world in the production of most necessary metals except tin. America must look to the ancient mines of the British Isles for nearly all the tin used in innumerable domestic and commercial ways.

In view of the interest in an adequate tin supply for the United States and the discussion of the smelting of Bolivian ore on the Atlantic seaboard, and possibly on Puget Sound, the publication by the United States geological survey of a special bulletin on tin mining in Alaska is opportune. It is noteworthy, too, that specimens of stream tin were collected by survey geologists in Alaska in 1906, before this metal was known to occur in the territory. Soon after that time prospecting for stream tin became active, and two years later a commercial production of tin ore was made.

The survey was also closely identified with the finding of lode deposits of tin. In 1903 two prospectors brought to survey geologists in Alaska some specimens of float from lode tin ore. All the specimens but one were worthless. From this one the geologists obtained tin by smelting it in a teacup in their cookstove, after which both the geologists and the prospectors went to lost river and discovered a vein of lode tin. The lode on Lost river has since been extensively mined. Some of the Alaska tin ore has been reduced at Seattle, Wash., within the last two years.

The total tin production for the period 1902-1914 amounted to 526 tons of metallic tin, valued at $380,000.
